La manipulación lingüística en la prensa francesa y española: la inmigración

In a comparative analysis and in the framework of the Critical Discourse Analysis theories, we study the discursive treatment of issues of national interest related to the topic of migration carried out by the newspapers Le Monde (France) and El País (Spain): the Roma population from France and the attempts of African immigrants to enter Spain, crossing the border of the Spanish cities of Ceuta and Melilla. The study represents my bachelor's thesis and it was undertaken in 2013-2014, in the context of intensified discriminatory public discourse in both countries. The conclusions reveal that both newspapers were reflecting the mainstream political discourse and participated in the reproduction and accentuation of social and ethnic discrimination.

Le soutien apporté par l'Union européenne aux animateurs socio-éducatifs impliqués dans la prévention de la radicalisation menant à l'extrémisme violent

The study represents my second year of master's thesis and it focuses on the topic of radicalization leading to violent extremism, as part of my internship at the French National Fund for Family Allocations, the national institution implementing the social policies dedicated to families. The study is based on the comparison between the great variety of definitions, policies and needs of the Member states, with a focus on France and Sweden, and the solutions proposed by the EU, with a deeper insight of the Erasmus+ program. The main conclusions are that not only Member states have very different visions of the prevention, but even within a single state, contradictory perceptions and professional cultures hinder the efficiency of the prevention strategy. On the one side, the diversity of contexts and sometimes lack of interest of the Member states make the cooperation difficult and this can also include changes of priorities on the political agenda; on the other side, the European Commission still has to ameliorate its capacity to carry out and coordinate a cross-sectoral dynamics of work and its reactivity to the needs expressed by the first-line practitioners and to include them in the political negotiation.
